Growth System Starter Guide

How to map the system between attention and revenue in your own business, and find the step that is costing you the most.

In this guide

- 01 — The six-stage growth system, explained
- 02 — How to locate your bottleneck without guessing
- 03 — What to build first when several things are broken
- 04 — The questions to answer before commissioning any build

SECTION 01

The growth system, explained

You may not have an attention problem. You may have a system problem. Most businesses invest heavily in the first stage and hope for the last. The work that decides the outcome sits in the middle — in the offer, the system, and the conversion path that connect the two.

01 Attention

Traffic arrives

02 Offer

Something to want

03 System

The path between

04 Conversion

A decision is made

05 Customer

Revenue exists

06 Growth

It repeats

Every business runs on some version of this sequence, whether or not it has been designed on purpose. Growth work is deciding which of these six stages is the constraint right now, then building the specific piece of infrastructure that makes it function — not rebuilding stages that already work.

SECTION 02

Locate your bottleneck without guessing

Find the statement below closest to your situation. Each one points to a likely bottleneck and the signs that usually confirm it. This is a starting hypothesis, not a professional diagnosis — the real read comes from looking at your actual business.

“I need more qualified leads.”

Likely bottleneck: Lead capture and qualification

The problem is usually not volume. It is that interest arrives with nowhere to go and no way to sort serious buyers from browsers. Without capture and qualification, every good lead depends on someone happening to email you.

- Traffic exists, but you cannot name where a lead enters the business.
- Enquiries arrive unstructured, so you qualify manually on every call.
- Good-fit and bad-fit prospects get the same experience.

“People see my business, but they don't take action.”

Likely bottleneck: Offer clarity and next-step design

Visibility is doing its job. What is missing is a specific, obvious, low-friction next step — and an offer stated clearly enough that someone can decide it is for them.

- The page describes what you do, not what someone should do next.
- Several competing calls to action, so none of them lands.
- The offer is understandable to you and ambiguous to a stranger.

“My website isn't converting.”

Likely bottleneck: Conversion infrastructure

Your website may not need to look different. It may need to function differently. A site that presents information is a brochure; a site that moves someone from attention to action is a system.

- The site is attractive but has no defined conversion path.
- No lead capture beyond a contact form nobody fills in.
- Nothing happens after someone shows interest.

“I need a funnel.”

Likely bottleneck: Customer journey architecture

A funnel is not a page — it is a sequence. The work is deciding what has to happen at each step, what the visitor gets, and what qualifies them to move forward. The build follows that decision.

- You know you need a funnel but not which one, or for which offer.
- Traffic goes to a homepage rather than a purpose-built entry point.
- No structured follow-up after the first interaction.

“I have an offer but don't know how to package or sell it.”

Likely bottleneck: Offer architecture and positioning

When an offer is hard to sell, it is often because it has not been shaped into something a buyer can evaluate — a specific outcome, for a specific person, with a clear reason to act now.

- Pricing changes depending on who is asking.
- You explain the offer differently every time.
- Prospects ask what they actually get.

“I want to turn my expertise into a course or education product.”

Likely bottleneck: Education infrastructure

Knowledge does not become a product by being recorded. It needs a structure people can progress through, a way to buy it, and a path that leads them there from the content you already publish.

- You teach the same thing repeatedly, one person at a time.
- The material exists, but nothing hosts, sells, or sequences it.
- No route from free content to a paid education product.

“I want to monetize my audience.”

Likely bottleneck: Owned destination and offer

Audience attention on a platform you do not own converts only if it has somewhere to go. That usually means a destination you control, a reason to give you an email address, and something to buy at the end of it.

- Audience growth is not tracked by any owned asset — email, community, customers.
- The link in bio points at a platform, not a system.
- Nothing to buy, or something to buy with no path to it.

“I need a digital product or mobile app.”

Likely bottleneck: Product definition before build

An app is an expensive answer, so the question has to be right. The first work is defining the specific problem it solves and the process it replaces — then building the smallest version that proves it.

- The idea is described in features rather than in the problem it removes.
- The underlying process has not been run manually yet.
- No defined first user, or no way to reach them.

“I don't know what's wrong yet.”

Likely bottleneck: Diagnosis

This is a legitimate answer and a common one. Something is not working, and the symptom is not the cause. The next step is mapping what exists today — audience, offer, infrastructure, conversion — and finding the point where the chain breaks.

- Effort is going in and results are not coming out.
- You have tried individual fixes without a model of the whole system.
- You are not sure which part is underperforming.

SECTION 03

What to build first when several things are broken

Work in this order rather than by instinct. Fixing a downstream stage before an upstream one is broken wastes the fix — a better landing page attached to an unclear offer is still a dead end.

01 Problem What is actually not working	02 Strategy What has to change	03 System What needs to exist	04 Build Implementation	05 Launch Real traffic, real behaviour	06 Improve Fix the step that leaks
---	--	---	---	--	--

Once you know roughly which stage is constraining growth, it usually maps to one of six paths — each with its own sequence and its own likely build list.

Lead Generation

Attention arrives, but nothing captures it or sorts it. Interested people leave without becoming a conversation you can have.

SEQUENCE Traffic → Landing Page → Lead Capture → Qualification → Sales Conversation

MAY BUILD Landing page · Lead funnel · Qualification flow · Conversion infrastructure

Conversion

People find you and understand roughly what you do, but the path from interest to action is unclear, slow, or missing.

SEQUENCE Attention → Offer → Website → CTA → Lead → Customer

MAY BUILD Website · Offer architecture · Landing page · Conversion system

High-Ticket Offer

You have real expertise and can deliver a high-value outcome, but it is not packaged, positioned, or sold through a repeatable process.

SEQUENCE Expertise → Positioning → Offer → Application → Sales Call → Customer

MAY BUILD Offer infrastructure · Application funnel · Landing page · High-ticket conversion system

Creator Monetization

Content is working. Audience is growing. But there is no owned destination and nothing for that attention to convert into.

SEQUENCE Content → Audience → Lead Magnet → Offer → Customer

MAY BUILD Creator website · Lead magnet funnel · Email capture infrastructure · High-ticket offer system · Digital product infrastructure

Education

Your knowledge is valuable and repeatable. It needs a structure people can buy, complete, and get results from.

SEQUENCE Audience → Free Value → Education → Course / Program → Customer

MAY BUILD Education platform · Course infrastructure · Landing pages · Funnel · Customer journey

Digital Product / App

The solution is a product, not a page. Someone needs to use software to get the outcome you are selling.

SEQUENCE Problem → Product → Digital Experience → User → Retention

MAY BUILD Web application · Mobile application · Customer portal · Custom digital product

SECTION 04

Questions to answer before commissioning any build

Whether you build this yourself or bring someone in, answering these four sets of questions first is what turns a request into a scoped, sequenced project.

01 Diagnose

Understand your business, audience, offer, and current growth system.

- Where does attention currently come from, and how much of it is owned?
- What is the offer, and can a stranger evaluate it in one read?
- What exists today between attention and a paying customer?
- Which step loses the most people, and why?

02 Architect

Determine what needs to exist and how the pieces should connect.

- What sequence has to work end to end?
- What is the minimum infrastructure that makes it function?
- What gets built first, and what can wait?
- How will we know whether it works?

03 Build

Implement the required website, funnel, offer infrastructure, digital product, or application.

- Does each piece do the job the architecture assigned it?
- Is the path from entry to conversion unbroken?
- Is it fast, accessible, and usable on a phone?
- Is it instrumented well enough to learn from?

04 Launch & Improve

Put the system in front of the right audience and improve based on what happens.

- Where do people actually drop out?
- Which traffic source produces qualified demand, not just visits?
- What is the single highest-leverage change available now?
- What did we learn that changes the architecture?

Start with the bottleneck. The build follows from it.

Run the interactive version of this diagnostic on the homepage, or bring what you have — traffic, an offer, a half-built funnel — to a growth call.
